BOOKSHOP ASSISTANT'S EXPERIENCES

Dominic had always been a quiet and studious boy and had emerged from his secondary school with good exam results but little else. He was expected to join the other handful of pupils who had won a place at university. Yet, somewhere inside his head a voice said it was time he experienced the real world before continuing his studies, so to everyone's surprise he decided to take a year off. 'No good will come of it,' people said, 'he won't get round to applying for a place and he'll spend the next year drifting aimlessly – he is such a dreamer.'

Nevertheless, Dominic wandered into 'Archer and Son', the bookshop by the market square, which he had frequently visited with his father and asked if there were any positions available. Jobs were rarely advertised and were usually filled by word of mouth or family connections. Yet, on this occasion, Dominic was in luck as one of the staff had just left.

After the briefest of interviews, Dominic was given a job to begin immediately as Mr Pinkerton, the manager, prided himself on his ability to assess character and felt he had made an excellent choice as Dominic was willing and hard-working and knew a great deal about books for his age. His father comforted himself with the thought that he would at least be rubbing shoulders with the academic world. For his part, Dominic swiftly rid himself of his much hated schoolboy image. He soon felt accepted by his colleagues, Vic, John, Caroline and the strangely threatening Malcolm. Much of the time the staff interacted through a mixture of teasing, jokes and affectionate insults.

Yet, three months later this easy atmosphere had become strained and tense. Startlingly large sums of money had been disappearing from the till. Mr Pinkerton was reluctant to contemplate that one of his hand-picked assistants or accounts staff could be responsible and felt that the money had been taken by a lurking customer who struck when the till was left unguarded. Consequently, he worked out a rota so that only one person of the five who worked in the English literature department would be responsible for opening the till and ringing up any sales. The person concerned would be glued to his post virtually all day long.

Despite the new system the money continued to disappear and everyone including Dominic felt under suspicion. The thought that anyone of the genteel staff would be involved in anything like stealing was horrifying and he felt there must be a simple, harmless explanation for the discrepancies between the money on the roll of receipts and the money in the till at the end of the day. As time went on he started to question his own sanity wondering if he might be an unaware kleptomaniac. At times he felt the tension so hard to cope with that he was tempted to admit to the crime himself. And whenever it was his turn to man the till, he was terrified in case an honest mistake was interpreted as criminal behaviour.

By now, the relationship between the team of assistants had been poisoned for good and they all took to watching each other furtively from the corner of their eyes. Nevertheless, everyone found time to sympathise with Pinkerton who had aged ten years in just a few months. At the end of the fifth month the losses were still mounting and Dominic convinced himself that Vic and Malcolm working in concert were responsible.

In true detective story fashion when the end came and the thief was unmasked it took everyone by surprise. Mr Pinkerton had employed an agency to observe the activities in the shop and the offender turned out to be Caroline, the daughter of a Professor of Ancient Languages, who had seemed totally above reproach and suspicion.

MY MOST MEMORABLE TRAIN JOURNEY

A Kate

My most memorable train journey took place quite recently. While we were sitting in our compartment, two women entered with screwdrivers and dismantled the wood panels on the wall. They then took fake designer watches out of a black holdall bag and they hid them in the walls. When we got to the border, a guard came to check our compartment, tickets and passports. One of the watches had an alarm which fortunately went off when the guard had left our compartment.

B Amy

Careless, 17, and with very little money, I was leaning on the rails of the ship carrying me to France when a gust of wind snatched my ticket from the top of my open bag and dropped it in the sea. A wonderful ship's officer took pity on me and provided a handwritten letter explaining what had happened. With only the letter and the phrase 'Mon billet est tombé dans la mer! (My ticket fell in the sea!)', I travelled the French railways for three weeks to the south and home again.

C Dave

Crossing Australia from Sydney to Perth on the 'Indian Pacific' is an adventure. You pass through time zones and areas where man and animals have adapted to the harsh environment over many centuries. You travel from mountains covered with eucalyptus trees to dry dusty plains and deserts. You see kangaroos, camels and wedge-tailed eagles. As we headed west, towns and villages became fewer and fewer. Finally we reached Cook, a place on the Nullarbor Plain. It only had four residents left and they invited us to "become ill" in order to prevent the local hospital from being closed.

D Andy

An epic journey down India's east coast from Calcutta to Chennai took two nights and almost three days. The bare, sweaty, second class carriage was packed full of people. During the journey a wise old man told me numerous stories which always ended with the proclamation 'that is the Indian way'. At the stations I had countless cups of sweet tea and omelettes delivered by boys from the platforms. And no one cared that the train had arrived four hours late.

THE INTERVIEW

Suzanne was very nervous about her interview. For the last three weeks before it she was worried about it. 3.1. She had been told when she phoned the number in the advert that there were a great many applicants for it so she prepared herself. She made notes of what she might be asked and of what she wanted to ask.

When the day came, she arrived half an hour early. There were six other people waiting to be interviewed. They all looked much more confident than her. She began to feel even more nervous. One by one the others were called. Each of them came out looking satisfied. 3.2. She had decided by then that she had no chance of getting the job, so she felt relaxed as she walked in. She felt she had nothing to lose.

The three interviewers were all very serious and they didn't seem to be interested in her. She forgot all the answers she had prepared and said the first things that came into her head. 3.3. However, two days later she got a letter telling her she had been chosen because she had been the only one who had acted naturally.
